Brad assists public and private sector employers with labour, employment, human rights, and workers' compensation matters. In particular, he advises employers with respect to grievances, substance use issues (particularly around cannabis legalization), collective agreement interpretation, and appeals of workers compensation claims decisions.

Brad is thoughtful, assertive, and has a flair for finding the right answer. He enjoys interacting with his clients and learning about their business, the needs of their customers, and their goals. By doing so, he quickly earns the place of trusted advisor.

Brad began working at Harris as an articling student before becoming an associate in 2013. He currently sits on Harris' Student Committee, where he plays an active role in the recruitment of future team members.
